For Healthy Hair & Shiny Coat

The skin and hair coat protect the pet by providing a barrier between the body and the external environment. There are around 160 different skin conditions that can affect an animal, many of which are very common and some of them being lifelong.

The general condition of the dog's skin and coat is a good indicator of its overall health. Additionally, the general appearance of the skin and coat can be the first indicator of an underlying health problem such as a systemic disease. Symptoms relating to and skin and hair conditions in dogs are very broad, including localized or extensive itching, dryness, redness, sores, scaling, shedding and hair loss, as well as behaviors such as excessive licking and scratching.

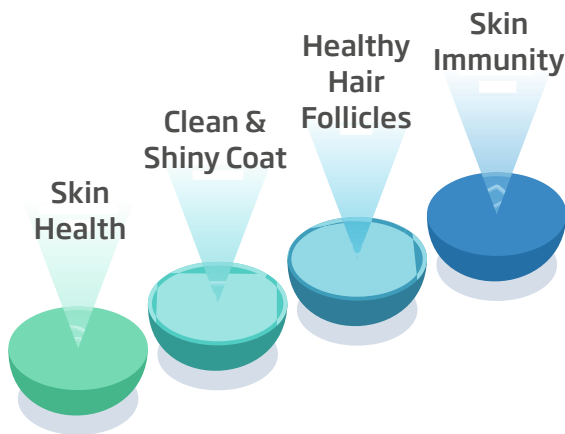

Do Your Pet's Skin Coat Matters?

Yes, it is! They play an important role in keeping your pup healthy and comfortable. They prevent water and heat from leaving your pup's body, plus they help keep viruses and bacteria out. The dog's skin coat has made by almost entirely of protein. If their diet doesn't contain enough quality protein, hair might fall out or become dry, weak and brittle. Likewise, their skin is made up of tightly packed flat cells with tough membranes made of proteins and fats. Without proper amounts of these nutrients, the cell membranes can weaken, allowing water to escape and bacteria and viruses to enter more easily.
